This volume treats of the rapid advance of Rome to a position of predominance over the older Great Powers of the Mediterranean world. Beginning with the struggle of Rome against Hannibal, it carries the history of the Republic down to the year 133, when with the tribunate of Tiberius Gracchus the revolutionary epoch may be said to begin. Included in the volume are chapters on Syria, Thrace, the Bosphoran Kingdom and Rhodes which, together with a chapter on Art, complete the survey of civilisation in the Hellenistic period.

"Sir Arthur Evans may be congratulated indeed upon the majestic progress of this noble work. The third volume follows naturally the format of its predecessors, and like them supplies a model of what archaeological publication can be. . . . "English scholars have not of late paid much attention to Pindar, and this edition has distinct attractions. Dr. Farnell has had the good sense to see that verse, however brilliant, goes some way from Pindar's text and characteristic manner. His prose of a Biblical sort reads well. . . . The comments add much to the value of Dr. Farnell's edition."—Vernon Rendall in "The Saturday Review."
