

TSARIST RUSSIA AND BALKAN NATIONALISM

Russian Influence in the Internal Affairs of Bulgaria and Serbia, 1879-1886

BY CHARLES JELAVICH

This is a study of the troubled period just after the Congress of Berlin, when Bulgaria was newly created and Russia and Austria-Hungary contested for dominance in the Balkans. The volume is especially interesting as a case study in the possibility of Russia carrying out her professed Pan-slav ideals. Based on materials in the Public Record Office in London, the Haus- Hof- und Staatsarchiv in Vienna, and the unpublished private papers of Nikolai Karlovich Giers, the Russian foreign minister during the period.

RUSSIAN FAR EASTERN POLICY, 1881-1904

With Special Emphasis on the Causes of the Russo-Japanese War

BY ANDREW MALOZEMOFF

Until 1895 the tsarist government had no positive foreign policy in the Far East. The Russian drive for an ice-free port was by no means the dominant consideration. The author shows how, after Japan defeated China and entered the key areas of Korea and southern Manchuria, Russia countered by securing three major Chinese concessions—the Chinese Eastern Railway, the lease of Port Arthur and Dairen, and the South Manchurian Railway. The author studies in detail the intricate diplomatic maneuvers and government stratagems which lay behind these moves.

TITOISM IN ACTION

The Reforms in Yugoslavia after 1948

BY FRED WARNER NEAL

A specialist on Eastern Europe, Mr. Neal has made a first hand study of the Yugoslavs' policies and problems: he describes in detail the measures aimed at workers' control of industry and decentralization of state and party functions. He explores the discrepancies between theory and practice that have developed in such matters, and points out the underlying strategic factors that have conditioned the policies of the Titoist regime.
