

The public and even the profession need to appreciate that although some cases with slight mental symptoms (which are merely epiphenomena) may recover under unskilled nursing, such care may often do infinite harm when there is serious disorder. Many epiphenomenal cases, from want of proper discrimination, are unnecessarily removed from home, and by their recovery encourage the belief that skilled nursing is not needed in mental disorder.

There have been, and no doubt still are, many indifferent mental nurses, but there is a wide gulf between the hospital and the efficient mental nurse.

The high personal qualities demanded of asylum nurses, which are too frequently passed over as a matter of course, cannot be too forcibly and publicly insisted on, both to overcome the prejudice that survives from a time when asylum keepers were untrained and uneducated, and to draw to the service people of a higher grade.

Lunacy Prophecy.

A contemporary reports a Detroit "doctor and scientist," "after a careful investigation of existing conditions," as asserting that "260 years hence everyone in the United States will be insane." The population by that time will amount to a few hundred millions, so that this prophecy affords an opening for much speculation. Imagination paints the General Paralytic Progressive Party contesting with the chronically Hallucinated Conservative faction.

Religion would certainly be the province of an epileptic priesthood, with many melancholic devotees.

Paranoia would add interest to philosophy, while confusional cases would probably revel in metaphysics.

Literature and science would be the province of the idiot savants, whilst the labour of the community would no doubt fall to the dements.

Similar predictions were no doubt made some fifty years ago in regard to criminality, but fortunately they are not being fulfilled. Eternal hope suggests that perhaps lunacy may not continue to progress by leaps and bounds, and that three centuries hence America may not be more mad than England at the time of Hamlet.
