On the cover: On the cover: In "The Food of Our Youth," originally published as the cover of the September 21, 1881, issue of Puck magazine, a young boy clutches a rifle, six-shooter, and bowie knife while he rocks in a cradle labeled "Infant Indian Exterminators" and sucks from an oversized bottle filled with dime novels. Clearly, at least some Gilded Age Americans were concerned with the pabulum their youngsters were ingesting. As Brian Rouleau shows in this issue, however, young Americans were not just consumers of such reading material—rather, they were also amateur writers who used portable, tabletop presses to produce a "pint-sized public sphere" where they wrote and disseminated their own stories of settler colonialism and frontier violence.
