

the first men in Oxford to consider their branch of medicine, namely, the psychological side; it was through the influence of Sir Farquhar that this branch of medicine had been recognized at Oxford. He was a great neurologist, and some of those present might remember that the psychiatrist and the neurologist thought along different lines, and occasionally dealt each other buffets. But to-day the Association was entertaining a neurologist who never buffeted the psychiatrist, but on the contrary, helped and co-operated with him.

He did not know that there was much in names, but he believed there was a bird of the same name which had remarkably long vision, and he did not think the lecturer's surname belied itself in that respect. He could see further than others because he had a more highly developed vision.

He had the greatest pleasure in seconding the vote. (Applause.)

The vote of thanks was carried by acclamation.
