A History of MODERN CHINESE FICTION 1917 - 1957

This is the first critical survey of modern Chinese fiction. It describes the major literary ideas and trends from the Literary Revolution of 1917 to the purge of mainland authors in 1957, and reviews the work of twenty important Chinese writers against the historical and ideological background of these tumultuous years.

The powerful impact of Communist literary theory is thoroughly investigated, with particular reference to the cultural directives of Mao Tse-tung, and careful attention is given to the use of literature for political agitation.

The author analyzes representative Chinese novels and short stories according to principles of Western criticism. Excerpts from many of these works are presented in translation to suggest the spirit of the original and to provide a framework for critical evaluation.

C. T. HSIA

Especially useful is a complete glossary of Chinese names, titles, and terms, and there is a bibliography of works available in English translation. Tsi-an Hsia supplies a valuable appendix on the literary situation on Taiwan.

A native of Soochow, China, C. T. Hsia was educated at the University of Shanghai and at Yale University, where he received his Ph.D. in 1951. He is now associate professor of English at State University College of Education, Potsdam, New York.
