

NO OBVIOUS HOME: THE FLIGHT OF THE PORTUGUESE “TRIBE” FROM MAKASSAR TO AYUTTHAYA AND CAMBODIA DURING THE 1660S

Stefan Halikowski Smith

Swansea University

E-mail s.halikowski-smith@swansea.ac.uk

Western historiography has both turned its back on the Portuguese in the East after their ascendancy during the sixteenth century, and largely misunderstood the changed seventeenth-century realities of that presence. While scholars recognize how the missionary blueprint overtook the military one, the Portuguese population, particularly in areas outside official Crown control, in fact had very little to do with Europe, nowhere more so than in its racial composition. One might think of this entity as a “clan” or “tribe”. The internal social structure of this entity, and the reasons it was able to gain mass allegiance on the part of native populations, remains to be ascertained. This article examines how the “tribe” responded to two successive displacements as a result of the Dutch conquests of Melaka in 1641 and Makassar in the 1660s, considering why it moved to mainland South-East Asia and what this movement tells us about the group’s dynamics.

This article begins at the intersection of two recent historiographical developments. On the one hand, Western historiography has tended to characterize the Portuguese in the Indian Ocean world as having fallen into thorough decline from the 1620s, and has also pondered endlessly over the reasons.¹ On the other, while historians continue to research the East between 1500 and 1800 in terms of European entities (Portuguese, English or Dutch) they fail to acknowledge that the vast majority of “Portuguese” were not soldiers or officials sent out to the Estado da Índia,² but rather dark-skinned mestiços who had never been to Portugal; people who, for example, appropriated certain items of Portuguese dress such as hats whilst neglecting others such as shoes, who were Christians not out of conviction but rather for the status it conferred. This was particularly true of what George Winius called the “Shadow Empire”, a vast but obscure umbra of Portuguese influence beyond Cape Comorin that for the most part operated outside the formal imperial mechanisms embodied by the Estado da Índia – a world, in other words, with little claim to having been forged by the “children of Albuquerque”.³ William Dampier, for example, describing

1 Most recently, Van Veen 2000.

2 Boxer 1991.

3 Winius 1995a and 1995b.

his visit to Lifao on Timor in 1699, remarked that the inhabitants were “chiefly a sort of Indians, of a copper-colour, with black lank Hair . . . speak Portugeze, and are of the Romish religion . . . They value themselves on the account of their Religion and descent from the Portugeze.” While Dampier noted “some thousands” of these “black Portuguese”, he saw only three of four “white Portuguese, of whom two were priests”.⁴

Leonard Andaya has brilliantly introduced a way out of this historiographical impasse by positing the conceptual category of “the Portuguese tribe”, if primarily because in his opinion the Portuguese “tribe” functioned much as any other “tribe” (suku) in the Indonesian archipelago.⁵ Andaya’s new formulation has initiated a research trend on a society previously overlooked and little understood by Eurocentrist historians, though to be fair it was from time to time addressed by anthropologists and ethnologists. While Andaya has pursued his ideas across the archipelago and particularly in the Malay world, and scholars of the Netherlands Indies have worked on the mardijker population descended from Portuguese slaves in Batavia (later known as Indos and Indisch),⁶ here I will pursue the Portuguese “tribe” in a part of the world yet unexplored by historians – mainland South-East Asia – an area hit by a diasporic wave of the Portuguese “tribe” following its eviction from Makassar in various stages during the 1660s by the Dutch.

DUTCH DESIGNS ON MAKASSAR, 1650–1667

Makassar became one of the primary port cities in Indonesia, particularly after Malay immigration there following the fall of Melaka to the Portuguese in 1511.⁷ The city developed as a major collection and distribution point for spices, but also offered shipbuilding, the production of white and checked cotton cloth, and intensive cultivation of rice.⁸ The Portuguese, who after all were more traders than active cultivators, and who by the seventeenth century were excluded by the Dutch from direct access to the rich trades of fine spices from the Moluccan archipelago, settled there and capitalized on Makassar’s role of entrepôt. There they intermarried, often bringing in slaves from both Coromandel and East Africa. New ideas and technologies such as gunnery and the calendar are accredited to them. The community succeeded, invigorated by regular international trade with places as far afield as Macao and Canton (source of gold, silk, china root, sugar and cotton goods), Manila (important for its silver), Timor (for its sandalwood), Bima (for its sapanwood), Malacca and Coromandel (from which cloth was imported). By the mid-1620s, its numbers there were estimated by Henry Short (“Sihordt” in Dutch) at 500 souls,⁹ a number which rose to as many as 3,000 after the fall of Portuguese Melaka to the Dutch in 1641, becoming widely known as the 4 Dampier 1703, p. 176.

5 Andaya 1995a.

6 Blussé 1986; Hellwig and Nagtegaal 1992.

7 Cummings 1998; Andaya 1995b.

8 Reid 1983.

9 Dagh-register 1624–1629, p. 125; “In somma de Portugiesen hielden Maccassar voor haer Mallacca”, Dagh-register (February 1625), p. 126; Maracci, 1651, pp. 76–77; Henry Short, “[they] kept it for their second Melaka and traded there as securely as if they had not an enemy left in the Indies because they have not

Portuguese “second Malacca”. Attempts to create a “second Malacca” in Solor apparently had not been so successful, with the Dutch under Willem van der Beeck reoccupying the old Dutch fort Henricus in February 1646.¹⁰ The inhabitants of Portuguese Melaka probably were inspired by official voices in their decision where to move to. In 1638 none other than the Viceroy at Goa had heaped praise on the treatment awaiting the Portuguese in Makassar: “In all the Southern Archipelago there is no other ruler who protects the Portuguese with greater firmness and allows conversion to the Christian faith.”¹¹

In Makassar, the Portuguese were permitted to establish as many as four places of Christian worship according to the different congregations and religious orders. Still, they refrained from building a fortified trading post and, so as not to incite the ruler’s envy, built modest bamboo and palm-roofed dwellings. A biography was written about one of the most brilliant and colourful members of this community, Francisco Vieira de Figueiredo (1624–1667), known in Makassarese records as Wehara, a merchant of long-distance commerce who created an extremely wide network of trade relations. These stretched from Timor and the Lesser Sunda islands, to the Dutch authorities in Batavia, with whom he was obliged to get along, to Macao and the Estado da Índia at Goa. The latter he repeatedly petitioned for personal recognition and ennoblement.¹²

A vital source on Makassarese history in this period has been left us by Nicholas Gervaise, a would-be missionary for the Missions Étrangères de Paris, who returned to France to write, in uncertain conjunction with Louis Laneau, one-time Bishop of Mételopolis, the Histoire du royaume de Makassar, published in 1688. The text itself is far from objective: in the title of his work he emphasizes that it is a “particular account of the Arts and Cruelties used by the Batavians to establish themselves in, and exclude all other European Nations from that Country”. Gervaise himself probably never visited Sulawesi. Nevertheless, apart from indigenous accounts, namely the Sja’ir Perang Mengkasar (“The rhymed chronicle of the Makassar War”) by Entji’Am in and the Makasar chronicle of Gowa, it remains one of the fullest sources on this part of the world during the period.¹³

Gervaise explains how the Dutch harboured designs on the trade of that port city from 1650, to the exclusion of the Portuguese residents. “This,” Gervaise goes on, “was a difficult enterprise, for the Portuguese were very well settled in the island; the King had a great value for them, and the People loved them extremely.”¹⁴ The Dutch declared war on Makassar in 1653 and again in 1660, when Governor Maetsuyker sent a military fleet commanded by Johan van Dam to attack.¹⁵ Short-lived peace treaties were signed, which included clauses stipulating that Sultan Hasanuddin should banish all the Portuguese once been attacked there.” For more on Henry Short’s report, see Kathirithamby-Wells and Villiers 1990, p. 155.

10 Letter from G.G. [Gouverneur-Generaal] to XVII [Heeren XVII], 21 Dec. 1646 in Tiele 1890, vol. 3, p. 283.

11 Cited in Boxer 1967, p. 4.

12 Boxer 1967.

13 Skinner 1981, Cummings 2007.

14 Gervaise 1701, p. 35.

15 Bassett 1958, pp. 29–31; Van Isselt 1908.

Figure 1. Fred Woldemar, Dutch attack on Makassar, 1660 (Bibliothèque Nationale de la France, Cartes, Y832)

and their followers and dependants from his dominions.¹⁶ Andaya observes that “there was little indication by September 1661 that any . . . move of the Portuguese from Makasar was being undertaken.”¹⁷ However, a preliminary wave of the Portuguese diaspora almost certainly left before or around that time. From the Annual Letter of Father Matias de Maya we learn that Father Miranda left Makassar in the Dutch vessel Wakende boey (“The Watchful Buoy”), arriving in Batavia on 28 August 1661. As passengers not prisoners, they were allowed to disembark and even were hosted in “some grand and stately (fermosas) houses almost in the heart of the city”, though they were obliged to be accompanied when going outside.¹⁸ Accompanying Miranda was another Father, Manuel Soares, and perhaps also a lay brother, Francisco Rodrigues. On 6 September they left Batavia for Siam in the Dutch ship Enkhuizen.¹⁹ The Italian Jesuit Tommaso Valguarnera wrote in Siam on 3 March 1664 that he met there two Fathers “displaced (desterrati) from their residence in Makassar”,²⁰ who were Fathers Miranda and (Jacobs contends, though I believe mistakenly) Macret (Mecret).²¹ Other reliable sources suggest Macret headed for Cambodia.²² I think it is more likely to have been Soares, who subsequently appears as author of a report of his “pastoral ministry”, which he dispatched to Giovanni Paolo Oliva, Jesuit General in Rome, from Tenasserim dated 18 December 1666.²³ In any case, the diaspora continued right through to 1668.

16 Stapel 1922, p. 62.

17 Andaya 1975, p. 60.

18 Archivum Romanum Societatis Iesu (A.R.S.I.) [Rome], Iap.-Sin. fol. 22, 398r–407v.

19 Dagh-register 1661, pp. 266, 289.

20 A.R.S.I., Iap.-Sin. [Rome] fol. 16, 95v.).

21 Jacobs 1988, p. 238.

22 Biblioteca da Ajuda [Lisbon]. Livro do princípio, 78; Biblioteca da Ajuda [Lisbon]. Jesuitas na Ásia, 49-IV-66, fol. 78r.

23 A.R.S.I., Iap.-Sin. [Rome] fol. 22, 398r–407v.

The Dutch then began to sow the seeds of general revolt in the newly conquered province of the Bugi princes. Together, in 1667, under Speelman, the Dutch succeeded in imposing the Treaty of Bungaya, which established the Netherlands' commercial and military hegemony. The Treaty singled out dispossession and expulsion of the Jesuits, on whom the Dutch placed blame for the failure of their mission to the Chinese Court. The Treaty was equally firm on the fate of the rest of the Portuguese population: not merely expelling the Portuguese but forbidding them return even for a "monsoon trade". The stipulation proceeded: "and to the end they might have no means to drive a trade, that they should be confin'd to some village which should be assigned them, remote from any Trading Cities."²⁴ The remnants of the Portuguese community were to be resettled in Borobasson, less of a village and more of a city "of the second order in Makassar", if we go by the later traveller Albert Étienne de Montémont's description.²⁵ Dutch reports made after Figueiredo's departure stated that "there will remain here only three or four householders and a bunch of the rabble, who will also be difficult to dislodge, as Karaéng Sumanna says he cannot and will not banish them from his land." We have testimony of the "rabble's" staying on in some of the names later recorded by Dutch officials in the quarters of cheap bamboo housing of the city: Rachel van de Westkust, Maria van Bengal et al. (Maria was a Roman Catholic name quintessential of the Portuguese world); also the de Souza family on which Joseph Conrad later modelled his novel An Outcast of the Islands.²⁶

THE FLIGHT OF THE PORTUGUESE "TRIBE" AND COTERMINOUS DISPLACEMENTS OF THE MAKASSARESE POPULATION

Portuguese imperial authorities hoped to attract voluntary Portuguese settlers by championing Mozambique and the Rios de Cuama as an African Eldorado, or African Brazil – in the words of one state memorandum "the one quarter (cantinho) from which all can be remedied".²⁷ In reality, however, the economic situation there was unstable: the gold mines were closed and political instability accompanied the rise of Changamira, culminating in massacres of Portuguese at the fairs of Mocavanga and Manica. The ivory trade was the great (and only) hope. More importantly, however, official voices emanating from Lisbon were little heard so far from the only pronounced point of distribution, Goa. We must remember that no Portuguese relief whatsoever came from Goa to aid those abandoned in Makassar: the first vessel the Viceroy was able to muster, a galleon named the São Francisco, was sent only in January 1666.²⁸ In sum, official voices were little heard this far from Goa.

24 Gervaise 1701, p. 43.

25 Montémont 1828, vol. 6, p. 268.

26 Sutherland 1989.

27 The key document is the "Consulta do Conselho Ultramarino sobre o estado em que se acha o comércio das conquistas e ser-se conveniente comerciar-se deste Reino para os Rios de Cuama," 9 September 1673, Arquivo Histórico Ultramarino, Moçambique, cx. 3, doc. 9. For its context and elucidation, see Luís Frederico Dias Antunes 1994; also Ames 2000, p. 183.

28 Historical Archives of Goa, Panaji (H.A.G.) ACF/11 fol. 168v.

The Portuguese might well have gone from Makassar to Macao, had not the latter been in dire straits. As the Queen Regent Luisa of Medina Sidonia made clear in a letter of April 1662, it was “surrounded by enemies”, namely the Ching authorities who had seized seven Portuguese trading vessels in 1663, another six in 1666, and then went on to impose a tight blockade that was only relaxed in August 1667.²⁹ Figueiredo himself, despite being married to a Macanese, emigrated to Larantuca on the island of Flores, but not until April 1665 and only after ardent pleading with the Dutch authorities failed to save him his base on Makassar. A substantial population of Makassarese Portuguese moved with Figueiredo, marking a growth in importance and influence of that “centre of Portuguese energies” (centro de irradiação lusa).³⁰

Some voices suggested transplanting Portuguese Makassar to a similar Insulindian environment with strong latent trading possibilities. Bandermassin in Borneo was one such candidate, where Macanese came regularly to load pepper. In 1691, four vessels visited. It offered a way station to ships on longer hauls to the lucrative sandalwood resources of Timor and Flores.³¹ Contemporaries familiar with the Indian Ocean world, such as François Martin, gave it thought but ultimately counselled against such a move: for him, these were remote archipelagos of the “Mer du Sud”, the inhabitants of which were tinged with “barbarity”. Reports to which he had access only served to confirm these prejudices.³²

There was also a precursor for flight to the Philippines, which happened in May 1606 following the fall to the VOC of the Portuguese town of Ambon.³³ Admiral Steven van der Haghen initially had guaranteed freedom of religion to the Catholic Portuguese. As elsewhere, however, the guarantee did not last long. The erosion of religious freedom seems to have been the trigger for this diaspora. An initial group – somewhat larger than the one that would follow – moved in two ships to Melaka in March 1605, under the leadership of the Portuguese governor. On the second occasion as many as 250 left Ambon.³⁴ The superior of the mission, Lorenzo Massonio, and his assistant, Andrea Pereira, could not take all the Jesuits and their converts in the ship placed at their disposal, so they took only the sick and made for Cebu as fast as they could. Luckily, Bishop Agurto had provided Cebu with a hospital a year or so earlier and asked the Jesuits to take charge of it. Here the exiles were housed, fed and cared for until they were well enough to move on. The Jesuits financed the operation partly from their own resources, partly by going to the wealthier citizens and asking each to endow a bed; i.e. to furnish a bed, with all its appurtenances such as pillows and sheets, and then to contribute what was needed for the food and medical care of its occupant.³⁵

At the time of the Makassarese troubles in the 1660s, however, the entente between Portugal and Spain had broken down, following the former’s declaration of independence

29 Ames 2000, p. 131; H.A.G. MR/28 A fol. 140, 7/IV/1662.

30 Boxer 1942, p. 2.

31 On Portugal and Borneo, see Teixeira 1962, pp. 485–525. On the sandalwood trade, see Souza 1986.

32 Martin 1931–1934, vol. 3, p. 199.

33 Jacobs 1980a, p. 11.

34 Commelin 1646, p. 36; Tiele 1883, pp. 285, 289; Jacobs 1980b, vol. 2, pp. 681, 690.

35 Colín 1900–1902, vol. 2, p. 173; vol. 3, pp. 26–27, 162; Chirino 1610, bk. 2, ch. 27.

and the ensuing Portuguese Restoration War (Guerra da Restauração). Thus the Philippines were no longer an option for dispossessed Portuguese communities. In considering why diasporic flows of the Portuguese population ended up in Cambodia and Siam, we need to bear in mind the structure of the Eastern Church.³⁶ Although both Siam and Cambodia were under the jurisdiction of the Jesuit Province of Japan, which on occasion dispatched all the accoutrements needed for mass (hosts, vestments, missals, goblets etc.) to the struggling church in South-East Asia, both were dioceses that fell under the Malaccan bishopric's authority in a see that stretched from Pegu to China and embraced Solor, according to the apostolic bull "Pro Excellentia Praeeminentia" attributed on 4 February 1557.³⁷

Paulo da Costa, who led the diaspora to mainland South-East Asia, first appears as an important figure in Dutch documents concerned with the seizure of Malacca in 1641, in which he is described as "canon and archdeacon of the Cathedral, who has also been the Bishop's lieutenant and Vicar".³⁸ On this occasion, da Costa had led one diaspora of Portuguese Asians from Malacca, via Goa (of which Malacca was a suffragan see), apparently to discuss the situation of his diocese, to Makassar, where the Diocese of Malacca had been transferred. Twenty years further down the line da Costa was still, in his own words, the latter's "archdeacon and governor", although the Bishop had died in 1648 and the bishopric remained vacant, as the Vatican had not yet recognized Portugal's right to independence. Meanwhile, the archiepiscopal authorities in Goa had decided to transfer many of the Catholics in places like Maluku from the spiritual direction of the bishop of Malacca to that of Cochin, despite the huge distances involved and the decided improbability of any constructive dialogue.³⁹ As Governor of Malacca and one of the leaders of the Portuguese diaspora, however, Costa may have felt reassured that his title and hence leadership would remain intact after flight to mainland South-East Asia, which was part of the same see. We can also assume that those who went with da Costa, mirroring his own story, had probably themselves fled from Malacca to Makassar following the city's loss to the Dutch in 1641, rather than following the official Dutch repatriation process. The process involved yachts such as the Bredam being laid on, free of charge to ferry to Nagapattinam the Portuguese Ouvidor Geral (High Judge, or High Royal Magistrate), the Jesuits, the bishop Dom Luís de Melo, and other priests, and the principal citizens with their wives and children.⁴⁰ Finally, there is every likelihood that da Costa was influenced by the successes in the mission fields of Vietnam, described in the treatises of Cristoforo Borri, Relatione della nuova missione delli PP. della Compagnia di Giesu, al regno della Concincina (Rome, 1631) and Father Alexandre de Rhodes, Histoire du royaume de Tunquin (1650), as a "new Japan".

36 Cardon 1938.

37 Fr. Luís de Sousa (amplifying Cacegas) 1866, 4, p. 416.

38 Leupe 1936, pp. 76, 78.

39 See Teixeira 1961–1963, vol. 1, pp. 191–219.

40 Leupe 1936, p. 138, following François Valentijn 1724–26, vol. V, p. 343 ff. Actually Valentijn does not mention the Bredam, which other competent authorities would in any case suggest was decommissioned in 1639, see "Scheepsgegevens" at www.vocsite.nl (accessed 17 September 2009). However, since the vessel was last accounted for at Fort Zeelandia on 21 September 1639, it is quite likely as an old and redundant vessel that the VOC authorities used it for such a mission.

The organization, journey and distribution of the diaspora remain largely unknown to us, though Seabra affirms that it was the ships of Francisco Vieira de Figueiredo that carried the Portuguese to Macau, Timor and Siam.⁴¹ It is not even known how many members of the Portuguese “tribe” Father Germano Mecret, who led one prong of the Makassarese diaspora to Cambodia, took with him. But the instability of the Cambodian court was well known, and so numbers are certain to have been fewer than to neighbouring Siam.⁴² In some ways, the country’s political instability carried through to the life of the foreign communities there, with the Portuguese at one time standing accused of the murder of the Dutch personnel stationed there and two years later conspiring with the Cambodian ruler in the massacre of Chief Merchant Pieter de Regemortes and his retinue.⁴³ In any case, Louis Chevreuil reported seeing only one somewhat modest church in the Portuguese quarter in Cambodia, which stands poorly alongside the three, perhaps four Portuguese-run churches in Ayutthaya.⁴⁴

Despite what at first appears a coterminous phenomenon, the Portuguese diaspora from Makassar must be considered independently from a parallel exodus in considerable numbers of Muslim Makassarese to the Kingdom of Siam. The Dutch war in the East Indies, of course, did not just affect Portuguese communities, but the Makassarese more generally. As the Dutch promoted the Bugi prince, Arung Palakka, ruler of Bone, as de facto overlord of South Sulawesi, traditional political relationships were disrupted and new representatives were placed in positions of power. Many of the nobles of the Goa kingdom were unwilling to live under a ruler handpicked by their worst enemy, and resented the forced oath-taking which Arung Palakka demanded of them.⁴⁵ After 1669, “the trickle (of refugees) became a veritable flood”,⁴⁶ a phenomenon which continued due to protracted warfare for the entire course of the seventeenth century. Streams of Makassarese went to the western half of the archipelago, to Java, the east coast of Sumatra (Jami, Palembang) and Madura, others to Banten. One diaspora moved to the South-East Asian mainland.

The independence of the Makassarese diaspora from that of the Portuguese is clear from the fact that the Makassarese and Portuguese were fundamentally antagonistic: in the later insurrection in Ayutthaya in 1686, the Makassarese intention was, in the opinion of one first-hand observer, the Count of Forbin, to “annihilate all the Christians, Portuguese and Japanese, so that not one remains.”⁴⁷ Their independence is also evident from the way sources tell the tale of the diaspora. Gervaise, as he recounts one episode in his Histoire du royaume de Makassar, is concerned exclusively with the Makassarese diaspora and fails even to mention that of the Portuguese. The prince Daën Ma-Allé had lost his throne as a result of the Dutch rearrangement of the political landscape in the Celebes. Fearing his assassination, his advisors encouraged him to leave the kingdom altogether and take

41 Seabra 2005, p. 19.

42 Livro do princípio s.d., p. 78.

43 This at least is Casteleyn’s version of events 1635–1644, pp. 7–15.

44 Chevreuil 1674, fol. 145.

45 Andaya 1975, p. 116.

46 Andaya 1995b.

47 Forbin 1991, p. 69.

advantage of an offer which the King of Siam had made him several times of a place of retirement and employment in his dominions. Thus the prince embarked with “his wife, some servants, and about 60 Makassarese families also . . . out of the great esteem and love which they had for him, and desirous to be companions of his good or bad fortune”. They arrived in Siam in 1664, and were received extremely well, accepting a “fair House”, valuable presents given to his wife, and the title of Docja Pacdi, “which in Siam signified the Grand Treasurer of the Crown”. Moreover, the Siamese king distributed among those who had followed the prince

... a good Quantity of Land, more than was sufficient for their subsistence, gave them oxen to plough it, with orders to give the Prince the same respects as to himself, as also to pay him the same Tribute as they were to pay him were he their King in Makassar.⁴⁸

Yet commentators such as Gervaise go on to write of the Makassarese as having become a constant threat to the Siamese (“their great numbers are to be dreaded”), describing the cultural tensions that arose between the two societies, and denouncing the latter’s “cruel and savage nature”.⁴⁹ The land grants and generous terms initially offered the displaced Makassarese were forgotten and, as a result of court intrigue and disaffection with Narāi’s increasingly pro-Catholic, pro-French policy, relations quickly degenerated to the point that Daën Ma-Allé threw in his lot with a “revolt of the Moors” in 1686. The rebels proposed putting one of the king’s two half-brothers on the throne and have him convert to Islam, although scholars have raised doubts as to whether either prince was aware of this proposition.⁵⁰ Chief Minister Phaulkon moved swiftly to suppress the uprising, rounding up Ayutthaya’s European communities for military assistance and charging the Count of Forbin to put down insurrection in their quarter. Refusing to surrender on the King’s terms, and too proud to supplicate for a pardon, events led to the extirpation of the entire community,⁵¹ perhaps in two separate attacks.⁵²

We have, then, established the independence of the Portuguese from the Makassarese diaspora to Ayutthaya during the 1660s, despite their common trajectories in time and space. The question that now arises is whether the Portuguese were to implant themselves in Siam more successfully than the Makassarese. The historian Stuart Schwartz considers adaptability the primary feature of Portuguese history, but Ayutthaya presented them with a new milieu, one crucially distanced from an open seaboard where this “people of the sea” (povo do mar) would find themselves instantly disadvantaged.⁵³ How now would they fare?

48 Gervaise 1701, pp. 50–51.

49 Gervaise 1701, p. 46.

50 Smithies 2003, p. 19; see also Launay 1920, pp. 183–85.

51 Ibrāhīm, 1972, pp. 36–38; Samuel White, letter of September 1686 in Anderson 1890, p. 289; see also the report by Père de Fontaney, in Tachard 1746–1801, vol. 2, pp. 97–128.

52 Smithies 2003, p. 15.

53 Schwartz 1995, p. 50; for the maritime proclivities of the Portuguese, see Alberto Sampaio, Estudos históricos e económicos, 2 vols. (Porto: Livraria Chardron, 1923).

PORTUGUESE IN THE KINGDOM OF SIAM PRIOR TO THE MAKASSARESE DIASPORA: A HISTORY OF MERCENARIES AND INTERLOPERS

Prior to the immigration of the Portuguese community from Makassar, Portuguese came to Siam as mercenaries, assisting the local kings ranged against the Burmese in the regional conflicts that raged from the 1530s until the 1560s. They were particularly thorough in their knowledge of firearms and cannonry. In Bocarro’s account, for example, they came to the aid of the “Black Prince” King Naresuen, when he entered single combat with the Crown Prince of Burma in 1584.⁵⁴ They were rewarded with land grants, settling down to marry local women and pursue the life of trade. A number of them won the personal attention of the monarchs, as reported in local chronicles. Fernão Mendes Pinto’s famous account Peregrinação . . . Em que conta de muytas e muyto estranhas cousas que vio & ouvio no regno da China (1614) describes the Portuguese as “much respected in this land”: they were given exemption from customs duties, generous pay packets from “the good king of Siam” and permission to build churches “where the name of the Portuguese God could be worshipped”.⁵⁵ Even the Siamese King Phra Song (r. 1629–1656) personally requested the Bishop of Melaka, Gonçalves da Silva, to send a priest to look after the Portuguese colony that had settled in his capital.⁵⁶ A religious mission was consequently established here from 1626 by the Castilian Father Pedro Morejón and António Francisco Cardim, who relocated after being forced to abandon the Japanese mission when anti-Christian policies there hardened in the 1620s. A number of Japanese converts accompanied these missions to Siam. However, the first Jesuit residence, established under Father Júlio Marguiço, lasted only until 1630, a temporary affair.⁵⁷

There are a couple of strikingly negative accounts of the Portuguese community in Ayutthaya during these years. The first concerns the circumstances surrounding the death of Mr. Benjamin Fary, head of the English factory in Siam, on 30 August 1616, an event which was ascribed to his “being poysened and, as they think, by the Portuguese”. The tragedy was compounded by his second-in-command, John Johnson, giving “entertainment to the Portuguese, not to men of any credit or fashion, but to the worst and most lewd livers in Siam, to the discredit of the house and shame to our nation, for every day there are thirty or twenty Portuguese there . . . abusing themselves with drink and making everything in the house common to the Portuguese.”⁵⁸ The bitterness to this report reveals what was felt by jealous northern European arrivals in the Indian Ocean world of the Portuguese communities at the time, but it is very telling that the report was based on another report by a Dutchman who arrived from Siam on 7 October, and then was conveyed in a letter from John Browne at Pattani to the English

54 Bocarro 1876, vol. 1, p. 119ff.

55 The Peregrinação, although often held to be a hoax, has nevertheless been praised for the veracity and detail of the sections that deal with South-East Asia: Smithies 1997; Pinto 1992, ch. 83.

56 Chappoulié 1943, vol. 1, p. 135.

57 Teixeira 1962, pp. 330–34.

58 Farrington and Pombejra 2007, vol. 1, pp. 205–06.

Principal at Jambi later that month. On 28 May 1617, John Johnson and Richard Pitt wrote from the bar of Siam to John Browne at Pattani to say that this report was completely false and that the Dutch “seeketh by all means possible to hurt us by their lying, viperous, scorpion tongues. We are merchants,” Johnson and Pitt explain, and “having goods to sell, we sell them and do not examine their [i.e. the Portuguese] way of life. If we had not bought from the Portuguese and others, we should have been forced to do so as the Dutch have done, to take freight.”⁵⁹

A second report was made a little later by Jeremias van Vliet, Chief of the Dutch Factory of Siam between 1629 and 1634. In it he raises a number of petty conflicts and thefts perpetrated by local Portuguese on the Dutch trading community, which resulted in the Portuguese falling “into disgrace with the king and mandarins”. His verdict in 1634 was that there remained “only a few poor Portuguese, Mestizoes and Indian Christians . . . they will most probably not regain their former influence”.⁶⁰

The Dutch at this time were, of course, dogged political enemies to the Portuguese. Other factors spoke in favour of the Portuguese community in Siam and the external stimuli to their fortunes. It was well known that the Kingdom of Siam was keen to recruit manpower, that Portuguese trade with the subcontinent was increasing, and that the King of Siam was generous enough to grant the Macanese a considerable loan to pay off the costs of an expensive Portuguese embassy to China.⁶¹ Ayutthaya had developed a reputation for hosting several foreign “nations”, including those of the Japanese, Malays, Dutch, English, Tonkinese, Chinese and Cochinese. M. de Chaumont, ambassador of the French king Louis XIV, counted more than twenty different nations, concluding that “There is no city in the Orient where one sees a greater number of foreign nations than in the capital city of Siam, and where one speaks so many different languages.”⁶² The communities developed different specializations: the Dutch, for example, concentrating on developing their Logie, or “factory” (a trading station), whilst others went on to play an active role in military defence, for example the Japanese manning a personal guard in the King’s palace. The Chinese served as officials of the state in different guises, often tax-farmers. Foreigners were allowed to enter the Siamese system of ranking based on “dignity marks” (sakdina) and to hold official titles.⁶³

“O CAMPO PORTUGUÊS”: THE PORTUGUESE QUARTER IN AYUTTHAYA IN THE WAKE OF THE MAKASSARESE DIASPORA

A social analysis of the Portuguese “tribe” in Ayutthaya might begin with an assessment of its size, although it is quite hard to summon reliable figures. Chaumont put the figure at 59 Farrington and Pombejra 2007, vol. 1, p. 277.

60 Van Vliet 1910, p. 54.

61 H.A.G., Embaixada, 1210 fols. 28–33.

62 Chaumont 1733, p. 109.

63 There is a huge available literature on this, but Andaya in Tarling 1992, vol. 1, pp. 346–52, is a succinct summary.

“more than a thousand . . . mixed race, having been born of a Portuguese and a Siamese mother”, to be distinguished from “eight or nine true Portuguese families”.⁶⁴ The French Vicar Apostolic Lambert de la Motte, who arrived in Siam in 1662, speaks similarly of 1,500 Christians “collected from different nations”.⁶⁵ Simon de la Loubère in 1687–1688 puts the figure somewhat higher, at 4,000.⁶⁶ Other accounts, such as that of Gervaise, who towards the end of the seventeenth century also wrote a book entitled The Natural and Political history of the Kingdom of Siam, would seem to corroborate this second figure – he speaks of between 700 and 800 families.⁶⁷ The Persian manuscript Safina-yi Sulaymān suggests the highest figure of all, a figure of 5,000 or 6,000 people who primarily had been converted to the Christian religion,⁶⁸ though this figure also would have included the Japanese and Cochinchinese population.

Maps of this period such as that of Vincenzo Coronelli indicate a “Quartiere dei Portoghesi”, a distinct quarter to the south of the capital between the Chao Phraya river and the western canal, in an area known as the Mu Ban Potuget.⁶⁹ Jacques de Bourges, resident in Ayutthaya between 1662 and 1663, explains how the nature of the city – divided into several islands by canals that form the river – helped the development of each nation on an island or in a separate quarter, “so that there are few quarrels which are often caused by the mixture of nationalities who have natural antipathies.”⁷⁰ The land granted to these foreign communities however was outside and hence unprotected by the city walls, and right through to the second half of the seventeenth century generally were depicted as an undeveloped Arcadian landscape on plan-views of the city, for example in the early seventeenth-century anonymous oblique plan-view currently in the Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam, and even as late as J. J. Struys’s Drie aanmerkelijke en seer rampspoedige Reysen, Amsterdam (1676). Later commentators describe the houses as being located away from the banks of the river and “generally built of Bambous, reed, planks and other ordinary stuff”.⁷¹ They were decorated and could easily be adapted for the comfort of a visiting ambassador such as Siqueira, who was quite impressed with the “considerable cleanliness, with [the] rich carpets and ceilings draped in cloths of various colours”.⁷²

We do not know precisely what the juridical arrangements were between the Portuguese bandel and the Siamese authorities – extraterritorial rights were regarded as an “important concession . . . to which princes in these lands do not readily agree” – but at the entrance to the camp the Portuguese erected a cross upon which was “engraved the terms of the concession, as a permanent memorial of the rights acquired by the King of Portugal”. Diplomatic exchanges in 1616 included the right to inheritance without

64 Chaumont 1733, p. 84.

65 Mgr. de Bértyhe 1674, p. 4.

66 La Loubère 1986, part 3, p. 112.

67 Gervaise 1688.

68 Aubin 1980, p. 110.

69 Coronelli 1696.

70 Bourges 1668, p. 162.

71 Kaempfer 1727, vol. 1, p. 31.

72 Seabra 2005, p. 170.

Figure 2. Plan of Ayutthaya. Simon de la Loubère, Du royaume de Siam, Paris, 1691. Illustration from the English edition, The Kingdom of Siam, London: Printed by F.L. for Tho. Horne, 1693, 2 vols. in 1.

any duties or confiscations and justice in the king's courts rather than those of the local populace.⁷³

The “Portuguese” had a titular head of their community, known to the Portuguese as Capitão Mor da Bandel; like the “Moors”, Malays and Japanese, this head was someone described as being “elected with the King’s approval and who governs in accordance with the customs of that particular country”.⁷⁴ In the Portuguese case, the post typically went to a churchman: Van Vliet speaks of “the vicar who has been appointed their chief by the governor”,⁷⁵ though the Capitão Mor at the time of Ambassador Siqueira’s visit in 1684 was Francisco Barreto de Pinna, a seventy-year-old man living in “severe poverty” who stood accused of various crimes including failure to prosecute crimes, misusing his post for the sake of personal profit, and (according to the Portuguese from outside) allowing the post to fall under the control of the King’s ministers. The de Pinnas had clearly fallen on hard times, for the family at one time had enjoyed Macanese citizenship. Francisco Barreto de Pinna (or Piña) himself had been a shipowner (and thus wealthy) who was put in charge of Siamese crown vessels, conducted international ventures, and at one time – according to Dutch records – made arrangements in Canton for their repair.⁷⁶ In 1684, the King of Siam was keen to expel Pinna, and Siqueira was forced to take him to 73 Records of Relations between Siam and Foreign Countries in the 17th century, Bangkok 1915–1916, Vajirana National Library, vol. 2, pp. 66–71; Bèze 1968, p. 40; for the privileges of the 1616 embassy, see Faria y Sousa (1695), tom. 3, pt. 3, ch. 9.

74 Gervaise 1998, p. 46.

75 Van Vliet 1910, p. 52.

76 Generale Missiven van Gouverneurs-Generaal en Raden aan Heeren XVII der Vereenigde Oostindische Compagnie, vol. 3, pp. 326–27.

Macao.⁷⁷ Siqueira was loath to leave the post unoccupied on his departure, principally out of worry for the fate of the orphans in the community, but also because there would no longer be a mechanism for civil justice.

Otherwise, the campo appears to have functioned something like a ghetto, at certain times restricting movement. During the court revolution of 1688 Robert Challe describes how “all the Portuguese were obliged to remain in a place that had been designated them, without being allowed to sally forth on pain of death”.⁷⁸ On this occasion, the Dutch Opperhoofd Pieter Van den Hoorn reported how the Portuguese, as a means to avoid arson and robbery, were quick to deposit their valuables, such as jewellery, gold and silver, in the VOC lodge, described as “a strong and excellent building . . . the windows protected with bars”.⁷⁹ On another, Van Vliet described how, in order to punish the Portuguese for acts of piracy committed on Dutch merchant vessels in Siam around 1628, the King kept the community confined “in strict captivity during three years and [they were made to] go about begging in the streets”.⁸⁰ But even when the Siamese King went “abroad” (i.e. left the capital), all the windows of the Dutch factory “had to be shut . . . and not the least noise to be heard”.⁸¹

Laws and punishments, as might readily be concluded, were harsh, even concerning foreign communities. The “sacrilegious” theft of the ampulla of holy wafers from the Church of São Paulo was considered a “horrendous” crime, and the Phraklang, or Minister of Foreign Affairs in Siam, was not slow to pronounce a sentence that began with the amputation of the right hand of the guilty party, to be followed by flogging to death at the hands of the Portuguese community.⁸² Capitão Mor de Pinna settled for cutting off the tips of two of his fingers, but according to Ambassador Siqueira’s report this was not enough to satisfy the Siamese. Elsewhere, Siqueira urges the new head of the Portuguese bandel not to accept any post or title from the Thai royal house, because the King then treats them as his chattels, calling them “Negros . . . and punishing them as his slaves”.⁸³

At its peak in the 1620s, the Portuguese community was of a comparable size or perhaps a little larger than the Japanese Christian community of Ayutthaya. Given both the mixed composition of the missions established in Ayutthaya in the 1620s by the Castilian Father Pedro Morejón and António Francisco Cardim, who were accompanied by the Japanese Christian priest Brother Romão Nishi,⁸⁴ and the joint guard that together manned the two forts of Ayutthaya, the Portuguese and Japanese communities not only were very close to one another in proximity, but also in sympathy. Macanese missionaries continued to arrive at this mission together with waves of Japanese émigrés all the way to the second 77 Seabra 2005, fol. 223v.

78 Challe 1998, fol. 5-5v.

79 Heeck 1655.

80 Van Vliet 1910, p. 52.

81 Kaempfer 1727, vol. 1, p. 15.

82 Seabra 2005, p. 214.

83 Seabra 2005, fols. 227v.

84 Ribeiro 2001, p. 66.

half of the seventeenth century, as was the case with a group brought by Bartolomeu da Costa and António Rodrigues, who arrived in 1634, when, as the Jesuit historian Marini proceeds, “the rage of that persecution in Japan barred the fathers [residing] there. . . . They found it convenient to move to countries near [to Japan].”⁸⁵

Within the Portuguese community, the Church was omnipresent. As an institution, it met both the religious and non-religious needs of the local community. There were during the 1660s three secular priests, four Jesuits, two Dominicans, two Augustinians and perhaps two Franciscans. The orders had individual churches. The Jesuits, favoured by the Portuguese Crown, appointed their first Superior, Thomas Valguarnera, in 1656, and ran the largest establishment, the Church of São Paulo, Paul being one of the role models of the Jesuit fathers. It was here that, prior to his marriage, the First Minister Constantine (or “Constance”) Phaulkon, who was of Greek origin, made a profession of faith in May 1682, which some accounts suggest took place in the presence of the Portuguese governor of Macao and friends.⁸⁶

The Jesuits also ran an educational establishment, the College of São Salvador, founded in 1656 from the proceeds of a successful Portuguese merchant and pilot who operated in the area, Sebastião André.⁸⁷ Initially it was a modest affair. In 1670, the school was run by four priests and one coadjutant. In 1671, as we learn from the Lettera Annuua of Macao,⁸⁸ it became a Collegium, and later what Coronelli refers to on his map of 1686 as the Collegio delle Nationi. According to Father João Alvares’s report (probably from the 1660s), which provides a historical sketch of Jesuit activities in South-East Asia, it was a French school for boys.⁸⁹ If it was anything like the Portuguese school in Makassar run by the Jesuit mission, its principal pedagogic purpose was to teach literacy, though the free primary school the Jesuits established in Cebu in the Philippines in 1595 offered a fuller syllabus, including instruction in Christian doctrine, reading, writing, arithmetic and deportment, with a course in grammar added somewhat later.⁹⁰ The college would have both lodged and functioned as a day-school for the sons of settlers of good standing and members of the court sufficiently open to a foreign education for their offspring.

The Dominican church São Domingo, oldest of the European churches in Siam, is visible on the late seventeenth-century Venetian mapmaker Vincenzo Coronelli’s plan. The site was excavated in 1984 under the auspices of the Gulbenkian Foundation. The approximately 250 skeletons it yielded were scattered with lime so as to sterilize the immediate area from decomposing human remains and to prevent epidemics.⁹¹ The Augustinians ran a chapel attached to the Dominican church, and shared the same living quarters.⁹² It was two friars from this joint establishment, Estêvão de Sousa and Pedro Martyr, 85 Marini 1663, p. 29. Some chapters of this work relating to Siam, Cambodia and Makassar have been translated by Cesare Polenghi in Journal of the Siam Society 95 (2007).

86 Sitsayamkan 1967, pp. 30–32.

87 Burnay 1953, p. 187.

88 Biblioteca Nacional [Lisbon] Miscellanea: Missões na Ásia, Ms. 723, fol. 607.

89 Biblioteca da Ajuda [Lisbon], Jesuitas na Ásia Collection, 49–IV–66, fols. 77v–84v.

90 Jacobs 1988, p. 205; da Costa 1961, p. 166.

91 Pumpongphet 1986, p. 25.

92 Kaempfer 1727, vol. 1, p. 31.

whom the King of Siam nominated to lead a Siamese embassy to Europe, much to the disapproval of Siqueira’s embassy, who called them “odd and somewhat deranged men”. About de Sousa, the ambassador’s secretary wrote: “Seems to behave more like a Siamese than a Portuguese. Instead of showing the qualities of a priest, he reveals himself to possess the free and distracted spirit of a layman, not yet fully following the norms of the Catholic Reform.”⁹³ This Augustinian chapel was probably one and the same as the Church of the Santíssimo Rosário confraternity, established by Father Luís do Rosário following the fall of Melaka in 1641, and perhaps an initial diasporic arrival of Portuguese population.⁹⁴ The parish was led in 1684 by a man for whom Siqueira had much respect, Friar Domingos de Santa Anna.

The negotiations Constance Phaulkon undertook in 1683 to marry a part-Portuguese, part-Japanese living in Ayutthaya, Maria Guyomar de Pinha, provide an interesting glimpse of the Portuguese community following the arrival of the diaspora.⁹⁵ Only sixteen years of age, her parents were Master Phanick and Ursula Yamada. Phanick was described as a “half-black, half-Bengali, half-Japanese” and quite poor. His wife, who had already been married to a Jesuit and had a child by him, claimed to be a granddaughter of the first Japanese baptized by St. Francis Xavier near Kagoshima in 1549. This, one of Phaulkon’s biographers explains, bestowed a certain nobility on her family in the eyes of her peers.⁹⁶

Phaulkon’s first thought toward taking a wife had been the daughter of a Spaniard from Manila who, when dishonoured by Phaulkon’s rejection, proceeded to marry a black named Hilary “who is even now the choirmaster of the Dominican Fathers of the Portuguese camp”.⁹⁷ These stories suggest the eclectic racial make-up of the campo Português. It must have contained Indians, particularly from Coromandel, Africans, Makassarese and Japanese. Unfamiliar European visitors to Siam appear to have been unable to make knowledgeable and clear racial judgements about the denizens of this world. Forbin, for example, talks in the same breath of “Portuguese, mestizo or creoles of the Indies”,⁹⁸ while Kaempfer talks of “a Portuguese race begot on black women”.⁹⁹ As we saw from the description of Master Phanick, it is not clear whether “black” meant African or from the east coast of India. Iberian commentators on the scene preferred, understandably, to distinguish “Portuguese” from “Christians of the country”, although law-breakers such as Burot, who stole precious liturgical vessels from the Church of São Paulo, is variously referred to as a “baptised Siamese Christian”, “a Negro” and a “New Christian”.¹⁰⁰

93 Seabra 2005, fol. 222.

94 Silva Rego 1952, vol. 7, pp. 465–66.

95 Bèze 1947.

96 Orléans 1692, p. 21.

97 “Mémoires en forme de lettre d’un Anglais catholique au R.P. Pierre d’Orléans Jésuite sur l’Histoire de M. Constance et de ses Révolutions arrivées à Siam en 1688.” Paris, Archives de M.E.P., Siam 854, pp. 887–942.

98 Forbin 1991, p. 50.

99 Kaempfer, vol. 1, p. 31.

100 Guerreiro 1930, p. 251; Seabra 2005, p. 214.

A second, very interesting, glimpse of the Portuguese community stems from the extensive report written by the secretary Francisco Frago, who accompanied the embassy of Pero Vaz de Siqueira from Macao to Siam (1684–1686). The primary motivations for this, the first Portuguese embassy to Siam in forty years, were to “banish . . . the French bishops, or any other Missionary Priests who had been sent to various regions by the Propaganda Congregation”, a political dispute of religious jurisdiction. But the ambassador had other orders of business as well. He wanted to persuade the Siamese to take on behalf of Portugal official letters to the Japanese. He also had express instructions to take prisoner Portuguese apostates like Francisco de Acha, who had converted to Calvinism despite being married to a member of one of the Japanese, and thus Catholic, families in Siam,¹⁰¹ and Amador Coelho de Mello, who had “forgotten that he has Portuguese blood and has become French, serving as notary to the French Bishops, purveying all the diligences and notifications against our Missionaries, harming the exclusive rights and Royal Ecclesiastical Patronage of His Highness.”¹⁰² A third miscreant the ambassador was to apprehend was Constâncio Jorge da Silva, a priest whose lifestyle was found to be too strange by his flock “due to the liberty he professed and practised much to the discredit of the Ecclesiastical State.”¹⁰³

It is clear that the Portuguese diaspora did not do well following their implantation in Siam, mirroring the general downward slide of the community from earlier in the century. Alexander Hamilton, a Scottish captain undertaking commerce in South-East Asia between 1688 and 1723, was very negative about the Portuguese, writing that they were “contemptible to all people in general”, in Siam “the most dissolute, lazy, thievish rascals that were to be found in the country”.¹⁰⁴ William Dampier (1651–1715), the English sea captain, buccaneer and author, echoed Hamilton’s dismissive opinions, insisting, “there are not a more despicable people in all the eastern nations.”¹⁰⁵ This is not merely a case of the Black Legend of Portuguese India as formulated by North European Protestant bigots.¹⁰⁶ Other commentators such as Gervaise, the French missionary sent to the court of King Narai the Great of Ayutthaya in 1688, attributed the “extreme poverty” suffered by the Portuguese settlers in Siam to the fact that “they prefer to die of hunger than to work for their living there”.¹⁰⁷ Even Thai records speak of the Portuguese who had arrived from Makassar as “those . . . who occupy the lowest category here”.¹⁰⁸ It appears that only one individual in the entire community, Domingos Lopez Cunha, possessed and 101 Acha appears in an entry for 3 January 1684 in William Hedge’s diary, see Yule 1887–1889, vol. 1. He did a significant amount of trade with Madras, and carried freight for English interlopers, which is why he probably converted. His British colleagues credited him with “fair-dealing” and “hard work”.

102 Seabra 2005, p. 322. The Portuguese Augustinians in Ayutthaya, Estevão de Sousa and Pedro Martyr, remained very close to Phaulkon, to the point where they became known as “his secretaries” (os secretarios do Grego), which only jeopardized their standing in Siqueira’s eyes (Novas do Reyno de Siam, fl. 186).

103 Seabra 2005, fol. 251.

104 Hamilton 1997.

105 Dampier 1729, vol. 2, p. 162.

106 Maltby 1971, Steele 1975; Robinson 1992; Winius 1985.

107 Gervaise 1998, p. 46.

108 “Answer given by the Prakaalang, Governor of the Kingdom of Siam to the abovementioned points proposed by the Ambassador at the service of our Lord the Prince,” in Seabra 2005, p. 276.

sent forth a ship for trade on the high seas. Portuguese maritime trade was in the hands of the merchant community in Macao, whose members chose to tread lightly due to the Siamese royal concession of monopoly rights to the English and Dutch.¹⁰⁹ Trade with neighbouring Cambodia nevertheless apparently prospered. An English report of 1664 noted that “most of the expelled Portuguese from Makassar resorting thither, who trade highly”.¹¹⁰

What went wrong with the diaspora? Should we lay the blame squarely with the Portuguese, as the three preceding authors would suggest? The Siamese rulers seem to have been cold pragmatists, who lost their love-affair with the Portuguese once they no longer seemed to be of any use to the country and shifted their attentions to foreign nations on the rise, especially the Dutch and the French. Bhawan Ruangsilp, who has recently written a book about relations with the Dutch, explicitly pursues this line of argument, using the concept of “conditional partnership”.¹¹¹ In 1649, on the return from his voyage there, Francisco Vieira de Figueiredo already complained about “Siamese vexations” (Siamse vexatien), and told the Dutch “he would never go there again” (dat daer noijt wilde weder keeren).¹¹² We can observe how the French were given certain privileges denied the Portuguese, such as being allowed to dwell within the city walls of Ayutthaya rather than having to move to a specified quarter outside, though the French Metropolitan bishop was built a “palace” out of town,¹¹³ probably at the heart of what became known as the “St. Joseph Settlement”, the centre of French missionary activities.

In fact, the Portuguese community seems to have done significantly worse than in neighbouring Cambodia, to the east, and in Toungoo and then Ava Burma, to the west. In the Burmese kingdoms, despite the tragedy that befell Filipe de Brito e Nicote’s community at Syriam in 1613, the Portuguese tribe (known in Burmese as Bayingyi) was supported by Portuguese trading networks from Coromandel bringing wealth into the area in the form of calicoes and chintz cloths.¹¹⁴ It is probably a gesture of tribute to the Portuguese community that they appear in paintings in the cave-temples of Po Win Taung, executed during the second Ava period (1597–1752).¹¹⁵ In Cambodia, where the Portuguese were settled in a village between the two imperial cities, Pohnéa Lü (Penhalu), they seem to have won government posts, and could ply their profitable trade upriver, trading in little-known gold, musk, benjamin and rubies of inaccessible Laos¹¹⁶ and, consequently, “live great after the fashion of the country”, as Alexander Hamilton wrote.¹¹⁷ Thus the diminishment of trading opportunities in Siam may explain the 109 Farrington and Pombejra 2007, vol. 2, p. 749, fn. 1; De Rooijs’s Report of 20 November, 1672, in the Nationaal Archief, The Hague. It is summarized in Dhiravat na Pombejra, “Trade and Court Politics in Ayutthaya,” in Kathirithamby-Wells and Villiers 1990, p. 133, fn. 13.

110 Farrington and Pombejra 2007, vol. 1.

111 Ruangsilp 2007.

112 Coolhaas 1960, vol. 2, pp. 334–35, 374; Heeres 1895, vol. 3, pp. 455, 457.

113 Kaempfer 1727, vol. 1, p. 22.

114 MacPherson 1995, pp. 221–22.

115 Chew 2005.

116 Gervaise 1998, p. 200.

117 Hamilton 1997, p. 190.

Figure 3. Portuguese in hat running from a tiger, temple mural from Wat Mai Ruak, Tha Rua, Thailand (photograph by the author).

downturn in Portuguese fortunes in Siam by the second half of the seventeenth century. Simon de la Loubère corroborates as much from the royal decision to reserve foreign commerce primarily to himself.¹¹⁸

Part of the problem was undoubtedly poor leadership of the diaspora. Da Costa, as he intimated in December 1665 to French Father Louis Chevreuil from the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, was anxious in his old age to retire from Cambodia to Goa in order “to prepare for his death”. He even wanted Chevreuil to take over his flock and “all his authority” (tutta la sua autorità).¹¹⁹ In his correspondence, Lambert de la Motte plays on this to underline his rivals’ worthlessness: that da Costa was happy to abandon his post to the French.¹²⁰ Da Costa’s successor as Vicar Forane was no better; at the time of Siqueira’s visit in 1684, a “priest who is worthless and has so little authority that nobody respects him”.¹²¹

Nor does the military element the Portuguese provided to the King of Siam’s retinue look particularly convincing. Kaempfer describes them as “idle vagrants”, who “roved and sauntered about the palace”.¹²² Forbin describes how they were divided up into companies of thirty or forty and then, given their mediocrity, assigned a French or English commander.¹²³

118 Loubère 1986, p. 112.

119 Chevreuil 1677, p. 105.

120 Archives des Missions Étrangères (A.M.E.), vol. 121.

121 Seabra 2005, fol. 226.

122 Kaempfer 1727, vol. 1, p. 29.

123 Forbin 1991, p. 50.

RELIGIOUS DISPUTES IN SOUTH-EAST ASIA BETWEEN PORTUGUESE JESUITS AND FRENCH MISSIONAIRES ÉTRANGÈRES DE PARIS

The Portuguese became more and more involved in a protracted competition with the newly established French order of the Missionaires Étrangères de Paris, who began to arrive in the kingdom after King Narai granted permission to French Jesuit missionaries to preach Christianity in 1662 and accepted the first Vicar Apostolic Lambert de la Motte. A papal bull of 1673, Cum per litteras issued by Pope Clement IX, effectively placed lands such as Siam (extra dominium temporale regni Portugalliae) under the jurisdiction of the head of the church at Ayutthaya, whose charge was given to de la Motte.¹²⁴ Motte asked the Propaganda Fide that all Jesuits be removed from Vicar Apostolic’s jurisdictions¹²⁵ and everywhere reported ill of the Portuguese priests “who held an over-inflated opinion of themselves at court”, “abused the credulity of the Siamese” and “got married ... for as long as it is convenient to them and it can satisfy their desires”.¹²⁶

The Portuguese contingent responded in kind. In 1663, the Archbishop of Goa circulated a letter that advocated “preventing the French to reach their missions by all means available”.¹²⁷ Certainly they were to be deprived passage aboard Portuguese vessels making the Carreira das Índias, the Portuguese authorities denouncing the “apostolic vicars” as mere emissaries of Colbert’s Compagnie des Indes Orientales.¹²⁸ But it was not merely international politics. During the 1670s and the early 1680s, Portuguese authorities received several heartfelt letters from religious and other residents in Siam and elsewhere complaining about the presence of French missionaries in the region, denouncing them as impostors and condemning their “evil designs under the garb of religion”. Antonio da Fonseca, Procurator for Missing Persons in the Kingdom of Siam, complained in 1682 that they wished “simply to prevent the Portuguese from settling in this region where their intent is to stifle us. All that the French Bishops wish is to see us leave.”¹²⁹ Joseph Candone, a Jesuit, was reported to have left his mission in Cochin China because “one of the French bishops would not allow him to serve as a Vicar of the Christian community in that kingdom”, to which the Council of Missions in Goa had instructed its missionaries in 1683 “not to obey the French Bishops, or any other Missionary Priests who had been sent to various regions by the Propaganda Congregation”.¹³⁰

In the meantime the French mission had gone from strength to strength: their bishop in Siam, Monseigneur de Cicé, estimated in a letter of 1715 that approximately 40,000 children had been baptized by the French since the inception of the mission, five new churches

124 A number of these documents’ exact locations are indicated in Bibliographie de la M.E.P. 2002.

125 Archives of Propaganda Fide [Rome], Scrittura Riferite, Letter of 22 November 1672.

126 Forbin 1991, p. 96.

127 A.M.E., vol. 121, p. 635.

128 Chappoulié 1943–1948.

129 Arquivo Histórico Ultramarino (A.H.U.) Índia, caixa 32, doc. 6.

130 A.H.U. Índia, caixa 32, doc. 95.

had been built in several locations across the country, and they had acquired exclusive rights to minister to prisoners.¹³¹

While the Portuguese Prince Regent Pedro ordered the Jesuits under his control to leave Vietnam in 1682, in the Siamese and Khmer kingdoms the dispute only exacerbated with time. A Portuguese embassy of 1684 led by Pero Vaz de Siqueira tried to win the support of the Siamese king in the quarrel. Unable to ask him to expel the French from his kingdom, they requested that, at the very least, foreigners be forbidden from entering the Portuguese Bandel and from disturbing its residents in any way.¹³² In 1705 the Bishop of Melaka, Manuel de Santo Antonio, sent a vigário de vara or enforcement official to Siam to lay claim spiritually to the kingdom. The French bishop, Monseigneur de Cicé, refused to acknowledge the Portuguese mission churches and felt obliged to excommunicate the vicar, at which point the Portuguese vicar arrived with armed partisans and laid siege to the French seminary, tore up the episcopal sentence on the church door, and threatened to carry off the prelate to Goa. The French responded by summoning the Bishop of Melaka to appear before an ecclesiastical court presided over by Mgr. de Tournon, the papal legate to China, on pain of a fine of 1,000 gold écus to be paid to Rome, but the Bishop of Melaka understandably refused to appear. Several other instances of ecclesiastical disobedience amongst men of the cloth occurred thereafter, and the rivalry was only fueled further by the Chinese rites controversy, which divided the two orders. The feuding continued until at least 1796.¹³³ Events in Cambodia ran parallel.¹³⁴

Alain Forest argues that the reason for the “internecine quarrels” between French and Portuguese was the failure of the Christian conversion project in Siam. But there were problems between the two communities from the very beginning, and the dispute spilled out into wider factionalism, with the Cochinchinese Christian community falling in with the French, and the Portuguese allying more with the Japanese. Musical confrontations took place between the two factions, on armed barges and during processions. When accompanying dignitaries into the city, each community would send representatives. On these occasions the Portuguese/Japanese would try to drown out the French/Cochinchinese with fanfare and noise.¹³⁵ But the French undoubtedly had the upper hand, if only because they had greater ambitions and retained the high favour of the Siamese authorities. Ultimately, some of the more enlightened Jesuits such as Fr. Maldonado saw the way the wind was blowing and used their influence to urge loyalty to the vicars from 1681, though opposition from the archbishopric in Goa remained.¹³⁶

131 Palys 1892, p. 9.

132 Seabra 2005; A.H.U, Índia, caixa 58, doc. 96.

133 Launay 1920, vol. 3, p. 114.

134 Loureiro 2005, p. 213.

135 Van der Cruysse 2002, p. 163.

136 Burnay 1953, pp. 193–94. Some of Maldonado’s letters are published in Analectes pour servir à l’histoire, vol. 36, Louvain (1910), pp. 187–96.

CONCLUSION

Because of the string of military defeats the Portuguese suffered at the hands of the Dutch at the beginning of the seventeenth century, conventional historiography all too often omits the Portuguese from the analysis of the Indian Ocean world. However, a number of French scholars such as Jacques Népote and Jacky Doumenjou have focused their attentions on the Portuguese communities in South-East Asia,¹³⁷ concentrating on these communities primarily in terms of “mercenary” or “interloping” activities for which the Portuguese were famous during the sixteenth century. Another perspective, left untreated by them, is that of these communities being part of ongoing historical development, such as the diasporic wave that emanated first from Japan in the 1620s and then Makassar in the 1660s. Ayutthaya lays a strong claim to our attentions because it was such a cosmopolitan city open to foreign settlers. There the dynamics of the Portuguese “tribe” are identifiable not only through the voluminous literature written by European visitors over the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but through urban plans (for which there is no parallel elsewhere, regarding the city of Ava for example). Correspondence and church records of the dispute between the French Mission Étrangère de Paris (M.E.P.) initiative and the entrenched Portuguese Jesuits also provide a rich body of evidence.

Recent research suggests that the communitarian politics of the Portuguese “tribe” and its diasporic connections across the Indian Ocean world were a complex affair. These insights should lead us away from the stereotyped image of the Portuguese as still something of a European power (an image inherited from the golden age of the Estado da Índia) and from the 1620s in decline. Relations between Portuguese settlers and host societies in mainland South-East Asia, however, were mixed, and in Siam dogged by economic poverty and outbreaks of inter-communitarian violence. While the French and Dutch were more successful in obtaining favour from the Siamese monarch and his ministers over the second half of the seventeenth century, the Portuguese community in Siam – always quick to miscegenate to a degree that made summary distinctions difficult – remained recognizable and distinct in South-East Asia well into the nineteenth century, as Crawfurd attested.¹³⁸

REFERENCES

- A.H.U.
Arquivo Histórico Ultramarino, Lisbon. Collection entitled “Índia”.
- A.M.E.
Archives des Missions Étrangères, Paris.
- Ames 2000
Ames, Glenn. Renasant Empire? The House of Braganza and the Quest for Stability in Portuguese Monsoon Asia, c. 1640–1683. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2000.
- Andaya 1975
Andaya, Leonard. The Kingdom of Johor, 1641–1728. Kuala Lumpur and London: Oxford University Press, 1975.
- Andaya 1995a
Andaya, Leonard. “The Portuguese Tribe in the Malay-Indonesian Archipelago in the Seventeenth and ¹³⁷ Népote 1995, Doumenjou 1992.

¹³⁸ Crawfurd 1828, p. 101.

- Eighteenth Centuries." In The Portuguese and the Pacific, ed. Francis A. Dutra and João Camilo dos Santos. Santa Barbara: Center for Portuguese Studies, 1995, pp. 129–48.
- Andaya 1995b
Andaya, Leonard. "The Bugis-Makassar Diasporas." Journal of the Malaysian Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society (1995), pp. 119–238.
- Anderson 1890
Anderson, John. English Intercourse with Siam. London: K. Paul, Trench, Trubner, & Co., 1890.
- Antunes 1994
Antunes, Luís Frederico Dias, "A crise no Estado da Índia no final do século XVII e a criação das Companhias de Comércio das Índias Orientais." Mare Liberum 9 (1994).
- A.R.S.I.
Archivum Romanum Societatis Iesu, Rome.
- Aubin 1980
Aubin, Jean. "Les Persans au Siam sous le Règne de Narai." Mare Luso-Indicum [Paris] 4 (1980).
- B.A.
Biblioteca da Ajuda, Lisbon.
- Bassett 1958
Bassett, D. K. "English Trade in the Celebes, 1613–1667." Journal of the Malay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society 31:1 (May 1958), pp. 1–39.
- Bérythe 1674
de Bérythe, Mgr. Relation des missions des Evêques François etc. Paris: M. Tiberge, 1674.
- Bèze 1947
Bèze, Claude de. Mémoire du Père de Bèze sur la vie de Constance Phaulkon, premier ministre du Roi de Siam ... et sa triste fin. Suivi de lettres et de documents. Tokyo: 1947.
- Bibliographie de la M.E.P.* 2002
Bibliographie de la Mission Etrangère de Paris. Paris: Les Indes Savantes, 2002.
- Blussé 1986
Blussé, Leonard. Strange Company, Chinese Settlers, Mestizo Women and the Dutch in VOC Batavia. Dordrecht: Foris Publications, 1986.
- Bocarro 1876
Bocarro, António. Década 13 da História da Índia. Lisbon: Typologia da Academia Real das Sciencias, 1876, 2 vols.
- Bourges 1666
Bourges, Jacques de. Relation du Voyage de Mgr. Béryte. Paris: 1666.
- Boxer 1942
Boxer, Charles R. António Coelho Guerreiro, e as relações entre Macau e Timor, no começo do século XVIII. Macau: 1942.
- Boxer 1967
Boxer, Charles R. Francisco Vieira de Figueiredo: a Portuguese Merchant-Adventurer in South East Asia, 1624–1667. Verhandelingen van het Koninklijk Instituut voor Taal-, Land- en Volkenkunde (VKI) 52. 's-Gravenhage: Nijhoff, 1967.
- Boxer 1991
Boxer, Charles R. The Portuguese Seaborne Empire, 1415–1825, 2nd edn. Manchester: Carcanet, 1991.
- Burnay 1953
Burnay, J. "Notes chronologiques sur les missions Jésuites du Siam au XVIIe siècle." Archivum Historicum Societatis Iesu 22 (1953), pp. 170–202.
- Cacegas 1866
Cacegas, Luís de. Historia de S. Domingos particular do Reino e Conquistas de Portugal, 3rd edn. Lisbon: 1866.
- Cardon 1938
Cardon, R. Catholicism in the East and the Diocese of Malacca, 1511–1888. Singapore: Malaya Catholic Leader, 1938.
- Casteleyn 2003
Casteleyn, Pieter. Strange Events in the Kingdoms of Cambodia and Laos (1635–1644), trans. and ed. Carool Kersten. Bangkok: White Lotus Press, 2003.
- Challe 1998
Challe, Robert. Journal du voyage des Indes Orientales: Relation de ce qui est arrivé dans le royaume de Siam en 1688; textes inédits publiés d'après le manuscrit olographe par Jacques Popin et Frédéric Deloffre. Geneva: Librairie Droz, 1998.

- Chappoulie 1943–1948
Chappoulie, Henri. Aux origines d'une eglise. Rome et les missions d'Indochine au XVII siècle. Paris: 1943–1948.
- Chaumont 1733
Chaumont, Alexandre de. Relation de l'ambassade de Mr. le Chevalier de Chaumont à la Cour du Roy de Siam, avec ce qui s'est passé de plus remarquable durant son voyage. La Haye: 1733.
- Chevreuil 1674
Chevreuil, Louis. Relation des Missions des Evesques Francois aux Royaumes de Siam, de la Cochinchine, de Camboye, & du Tonkin etc., divisé en quatre parties, 1674 [Italian edition, 1677].
- Chew 2005
Chew, Anne-May. The Cave-Temples of Po Win Taung, Central Burma. Bangkok: White Lotus Press, 2005.
- Chirino 1610
Chirino, Pedro. Primera parte de la historia de la provincia de Philipinas de la Compañia de Jesús (ms., c. 1610).
- Colín 1900–1902
Colín, Francisco. Labor evangélica, ed. Pablo Pastells. Barcelona: Henrich, 1900–1902, 3 vols.
- Commelin 1646
Commelin, Isaac. Begin ende Voortganch van de Vereenigde Nederlantsche Geoctroyeerde Oost-Indische Compagnie. Amsterdam: Janszoon, 1646.
- Coolhaas 1960
Coolhaas, W. Philippus. Generale Missiven van Gouverneurs-Generaal en Radan aan Heeren XVII der Vereenigde Oostindische Compagnie. 's-Gravenhage: Nijhoff (1960–).
- Coronelli 1696
Coronelli, Vincenzo. “Siam, ò Iudia. Dal P. Cosmografo Coronelli. All'Illustrissimo Sig. Giovanni E.mo Figliuolo dell' Eccentissimo S. Pietro.” 1696.
- Costa 1961
Costa, Horacio da. The Jesuits in the Philippines, 1581–1786. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1961.
- Crawfurd 1828
Crawfurd, John. Journal of an Embassy from the Governor-General of India to the Courts of Siam and Cochinchina: Exhibiting a View of the Actual State of Those Kingdoms. London: H. Colburn, 1828.
- Cummings 1998
Cummings, William. “The Melaka Malay Diaspora in Makassar, c. 1500–1669.” Journal of the Malayan Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society 71:1 (1998), pp. 107–122.
- Cummings 2007
Cummings, William. Chain of Kings. Makassarese Chronicles of Gowa and Talloq. Leiden: KITLV Press, 2007.
- Dagh-register 1896
Dagh-register gehouden int Casteel Batavia, vant passerende daer ter plaetse als over geheel Nederlants-India, Anno 1624–29. 's-Gravenhage: Nijhoff, 1896.
- Dampier 1703
Dampier, William. A voyage to New Holland, &c. in the year, 1699. Wherein are described, the Canary-Islands, the Isles of Mayo and St Jago. The Bay of All Saints . . . London: 1703.
- Dampier 1729
Dampier, William. A collection of voyages. In four volumes . . . Illustrated with maps and draughts: also several birds, fishes, and plants . . . London: 1729.
- Doumenjou 1992
Doumenjou, Jacky. Recherche sur les communautés interlopes portugaises dans l'Archipel Insulindien au lendemain de la chute de Melaka, d'après les Daghs-registers de Batavia (1641–53). Lettres et documents. Université de Leiden: 1992.
- Faria e Sousa 1695
Faria e Sousa, Manuel de. The Portugues Asia, or, The history of the discovery and conquest of India by the Portugues: containing all their discoveries from the coast of Africk, to the farthest parts of China and Japan, all their battels by sea and land, sieges and other memorable actions, a description of those countries, and many particulars of the religion, government and customs of the natives, &c.: in three tomes / written in Spanish by Manuel de Faria y Sousa . . . ; translated into English by Cap. John Stevens. London: Printed for C. Brome, 1695, 3 vols.
- Farrington and Pombejra 2007
Farrington, Anthony and Dhiravat na Pombejra. The English Factory in Siam, 1612–1685. London: British Library, 2007, 2 vols.
- Forbin 1991
Forbin, Claude. Le Voyage du comte de Forbin á Siam, 1685–1688. Paris: Zulma, 1991.

- Forest 1998
Forest, Alain. Les missionnaires français au Tonkin et au Siam, XVIIe–XVIIIe siècles: analyse comparée d'un relatif succès et d'un total échec. Livre 1, Histoires du Siam. Paris/Montréal: L'Harmattan, 1998.
- Gervaise 1688
Gervaise, Nicholas. Histoire politique et naturelle du royaume de Siam. Paris: 1688. Trans. and re-ed. as The Natural and Political history of the Kingdom of Siam, ed. J. Villiers. Bangkok: White Lotus, 1998.
- Gervaise 1701
Gervaise, Nicholas. An Historical Description of the Kingdom of Makassar in the East Indies. London: 1701. Reproduced on microfilm, Woodbridge, CT: Research Publications, Inc., 1986.
- Guerreiro 1930
Guerreiro, Fernão, S.J. "Relação annual das cousas que fizeram os padres da Comp. de Jesus nas partes da India Oriental . . . nos annos 1607 e 1608. . . ." In Jahangir and the Jesuits, trans. C. H. Payne, 1930.
- H.A.G.
Historical Archives of Goa, Panaji.
- Hamilton 1997
Alexander Hamilton. A Scottish Sea Captain in Southeast Asia, 1689–1723, ed. Michael Smithies. Chiang Mai: Silkworm Books, 1997.
- Heeck 1655
Gijsbert, Heeck. Derde Voijage van Gijsbert Heeck Naer Oost Indijen (1655). A recent translation has been made by Barend Jan Terwiel, ed., A Traveller in Siam in the Year 1655. Extracts from the Journal of Gijsbert Heeck. Chiang Mai, Thailand: Silkworm Books, 2008.
- Heeres 1895
Heeres, J. E. Bouwstoffen voor de geschiedenis der Nederlandens in den Maleischen Archipel. The Hague: 1895.
- Hellwig and Nagtegaal 1992
Hellwig, Tineke and Luc Nagtegaal, "Eurasians: Europeans or Asians?" In Quality of Life in Southeast Asia: Transforming Social, Political and Natural Environments, ed. Bruce Matthews. Montréal: Canadian Council for Southeast Asian Studies, 1992.
- Hutchinson 1940
Hutchinson, E. W. Adventurers in Siam in the Seventeenth Century. London 1940.
- Ibrāhīm 1972
Ibrāhīm, Muhammad Rabi'ibn Muhammad, The Ship of Sulaiman [Safinah-i Sulaymān]. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1972.
- Jacobs 1980a
Jacobs, Hubert. "The Portuguese Town of Ambon, 1576–1605." Paper presented to the Second International Seminar on Indo-Portuguese History. Lisbon: October 1980.
- Jacobs 1980b
Jacobs Hubert ed. Documenta Malucensia, Monumenta Missionum Societatis Iesu, 39. Rome: Institutum Historicum Societatis Iesu, 1980, vol. 2.
- Jacobs 1988
Jacobs Hubert ed. The Jesuit Makasar Documents, 1612–1682. Rome: Jesuit Historical Institute, 1988.
- Kaempfer 1727
Kaempfer, Engelbert. The history of Japan, giving an account of the ancient and present state and government of that empire; of its temples, palaces, castles and other buildings; . . . Written in High-Dutch by Engelbertus Kämpfer, . . . and translated . . . by J. G. Scheuchzer, . . . London, 1727. 2 vols.
- Kathirithamby-Wells and Villiers 1990
Kathirithamby-Wells J. and John Villiers eds. The Southeast Asian Port and Polity. Rise and Demise. Singapore: Singapore University Press, 1990.
- La Loubère 1986
La Loubère, Simon de. A New Historical Relation, of the Kingdom of Siam by Monsieur De La Loubère, Envoy Extraordinary from the French King, to the King of Siam, in the years 1687 and 1688, ed. David Wyatt. Singapore: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Launay 1894
Launay, Adrien. Histoire generale de la Société des Missions Etrangères. Paris: 1894, 2 vols.
- Launay 1920
Launay, Adrien. Histoire de la Mission de Siam, 1662–1811: Documents Historiques. Paris: 1920, 2 vols.
- Leupe 1936

- Leupe, P. A. “The Siege and Capture of Melaka from the Portuguese in 1640–1641.” Journal of Malaysian Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society 14:1 (1936), pp. 1–176.
- Livro do principio* s.d.
Livro do principio dos superiores, e benfeitores deste collegio da Madre de Deos de Macau [s.d.]. Biblioteca da Ajuda, J.A. (Jesuítas na Ásia), 49-IV-66.
- Loureiro 2005
 Loureiro, Vanessa. “The Jesuits in Cambodia: a Look upon Cambodian Religiousness.” Bulletin of Portuguese/Japanese Studies 10/11 (2005), pp. 193–222.
- MacPherson 1995
 MacPherson, Kenneth. “Enemies or Friends? The Portuguese, the British and the Survival of Portuguese Commerce in the Bay of Bengal and Southeast Asia from the Late Seventeenth to the Late Nineteenth Century.” In The Portuguese and the Pacific, ed. F. Dutra and C. dos Santos. Santa Barbara: Center for Portuguese Studies, 1995, pp. 211–38.
- Maltby 1971
 Maltby, W. S. The Black Legend in England. The Development of anti-Spanish Sentiment. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1971.
- Maracci 1651
 Maracci J. (S.J.) ed. Relation de ce qui s'est passé dans les Indes Orientales. Paris: 1651.
- Marini 1663
 Marini, G. F. Missioni de' padri della Compagnia di Gesù nella provincia di Giappone. Rome 1663.
- Martin 1931–1934
 Martin, François. Mémoires de François Martin . . . 1665–1696. 3 vols. Paris: A. Martineau, 1931–1934.
- Montémont 1828
 Montémont, Albert Étienne de. Voyage dans les cinq parties du monde. Paris: Selligie, 1828.
- Népote 1995
 Népote, Jacques. “The Portuguese, Cambodia and the Mekong Valley: the Logic of Discovery.” In The Portuguese and the Pacific, ed. F. A. Dutra and C. dos Santos. Santa Barbara: Center for Portuguese Studies, 1995, pp. 113–28.
- Novas do Reyno de Siam
 Novas do Reyno de Siam, s.d. Biblioteca Nacional, Lisbon, MS. 465.
- Orléans 1692
 Orléans, Pierre Joseph de. Histoire de Monsieur Constance, premier ministre du Roy de Siam. Paris: 1692.
- Palys 1892
 Palys, Comte de. Un Breton en Indo-chine au XVIII Siècle. Notice sur Monseigneur de Cicé, Évêque de Tabula, Vicarie apostolique de Siam. Vannes: Imp. Lafolye, 1892.
- Pinto 1992
 Pinto, Fernão de Mendes. The Peregrination, ed. R. Catz. Manchester: Carcanet, 1992.
- Pumpongphet 1986
 Pumpongphet, Patipat. “Les fouilles archéologiques dans Mu Ban Portuget sur le site de São Pedro.” In Phra Narai, roi de Siam et Louis XIV, ed. M. Jacq-Hergoualc’h. Paris: 1986.
- Rego 1952
 Rego, A. da Silva, Documentação para a História das Missões do Padroado Português, vol. 7. Lisbon: 1952.
- Rego 1979
 Rego, A. da Silva, A Short Survey of Luso-Siamese Relations, 1511–1900. Macao: 1979.
- Reid 1983
 Reid, Anthony. “The Rise of Makassar.” Review of Indonesian and Malayan Affairs 17 (1983), pp. 117–60.
- Ribeiro 2001
 Ribeiro, Madalena. “The Japanese Diaspora in the Seventeenth Century: According to Jesuit Sources.” Bulletin of Portuguese/Japanese Studies 2 (2001), pp. 53–83.
- Robinson 1992
 Robinson, J. “Anti-Hispanic Bias in British Historiography.” Hispania Sacra (1992), pp. 21–46.
- Ruangsilp 2007
 Ruangsilp, Bhawan. Dutch East India Company Merchants at the Court of Ayutthaya. Dutch Perceptions of the Thai Kingdom, c. 1604–1765. Leiden: Brill 2007.
- Schwartz 1995
 Schwartz, Stuart. “The Portuguese Heritage: Adaptability.” In Brazilian Mosaic: Portraits of a Diverse People and Culture, ed. G. Harvey Summ. Wilmington, DE: S. R. Books, 1995, p. 50.

- Seabra 2005
 Seabra, Leonor de. The Embassy of Pero Vaz de Siqueira (1684–1686). Macau: Instituto Português do Oriente e Fundação Oriente, 2005.
- Sitsayamkan 1967
 Sitsayamkan, Luang. The Greek Favourite of the King of Siam. Singapore: Donald Moore Press, 1967.
- Skinner 1963
 Skinner, C. Sja'ir Perang Mengkasar (The rhymed chronicle of the Makassar War) by Entji'Am in. 's-Gravenhage: Nijhoff, 1963.
- Smithies 1997
 Smithies, Michael. "The Siam of Mendes Pinto's Travels." Journal of the Siam Society 85:1–2 (1997), pp. 59–73.
- Smithies 2003
 Smithies, Michael. Marcel Le Blanc. The History of Siam, 1688. Chiang Mai, Thailand: Silkworm Books, 2003.
- Souza 1986
 Souza, George Bryan. The Survival of Empire: Portuguese Trade and Society in China and the South China Sea 1630–1754. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Stapel 1922
 Stapel, F. W. Het Bongaais Verdrag. Leiden, 1922.
- Steele 1975
 Steele, Colin. English Interpreters of the Iberian New World from Purchas to Stevens, 1603–1726. Oxford: Dolphin Book Co., 1975.
- Strach 2000
 Strach, Walter. "Constance Phaulkon: Myth or Reality?" Explorations in Southeast Asian Studies. A Journal of the Southeast Asian Studies Student Association 4 (Fall 2000). [www.hawaii.edu/cseas/pubs/explore/strach.html, Accessed 8 September 2009]
- Sutherland 1989
 Sutherland, Heather. "Eastern Emporium and Company Town: Trade and Society in Eighteenth Century Makassar." In Brides of the Sea: Port Cities of Asia from the 16th–20th Centuries, ed. Frank Broeze. Kensington: New South Wales Press, 1989.
- Tachard 1689
 Tachard, Guy. "Second Voyage du Père Tachard et des Jésuites envoyés par le Roi en Royaume de Siam, 1689." In Jacques-Philibert Rousselot de Surgy, Histoire générale des voyages, ou Nouvelle collection de toutes les relations de voyages par mer et par terre qui ont été publiées jusqu'à présent dans les différentes langues. Paris: 1746–1801, tome 9, book 2.
- Tarling 1992
 Tarling, Nicholas, ed. The Cambridge History of South-East Asia vol. 1, From Early Times to c. 1800. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Teixeira 1962a
 Teixeira, Manuel. "Early Portuguese & Spanish contacts with Borneo." In Kuei-yung Chang, International Association of Historians of Asia: Second Biennial Conference Proceedings. Taipei, 1962, pp. 485–525.
- Teixeira 1962b
 Teixeira, Manuel. "A Missão Portuguesa no Sião." Boletim Eclesiástico da Diocese de Macau 60, no. 696 (April 1962), pp. 330–34.
- Teixeira 1961–1963
 Teixeira, Manuel. The Portuguese Missions in Malacca and Singapore, 1511–1958. Lisbon, 1961–1963, 3 vols.
- Tiele 1883
 Tiele, P. A. ed. "Documenten voor de geschiedenis der Nederlanders in het Oosten." Bijdragen en Mededeelingen van het Historisch Genootschap 6, 1883.
- Tiele 1890
 Tiele, P. A. Bouwstoffen voor de geschiedenis der Nederlanders in den Maleisen archipel. 's-Gravenhage: Nijhoff, 1890.
- Valentijn 1724–1726
 Valentijn, François. Oud en nieuw Oost-Indiën, 8 vols. Dordrecht: J. van Braam, 1724–1726.
- Van der Cruysse 2002
 Van der Cruysse, Dirk. Siam and the West, 1500–1700, trans. Michael Smithies. Washington DC: University of Washington Press, 2002.
- Van Isselt 1908

Van Isselt, W. E. "Mr. Johan van Dam en zijne tuchtiging van Makassar in 1660." Bijdragen tot de Taal, Land en Volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indie 60 (1908).

Van Veen 2000

Van Veen, Ernst. Decay or Defeat. An Inquiry into the Portuguese Decline in Asia 1580–1645. Leiden: CNWS Publications 96; Studies in Overseas History 1(2000).

Van Vliet 1910

Van Vliet, Jeremias. "Description of the Kingdom of Siam," ed. L. F. van Ravenswaay. Journal of the Siam Society 7:1 (1910), pp. 5–105.

Winius 1985

Winius, George. The Black Legend of Portuguese India. New Delhi: 1985.

Winius 1995a

Winius, George. "Embassies from Melaka and the 'Shadow Empire'." In Proceedings of the International Colloquium on the Portuguese and the Pacific, ed. F. Dutra and J. Camilo dos Santos. Santa Barbara: Center for Portuguese Studies, 1995.

Winius 1995b

Winius, George. "Portuguese Travels and Influence at the Corner of Asia." In Portugal the Pathfinder, ed. G. Winius. Madison: Hispanic Seminary of Medieval Studies, 1995.

Yule 1887–1889

Yule, Henry, ed. The Diary of William Hedges during his agency in Bengal, as well as on his voyage out and his return overland (1681–87). London: Hakluyt Society, 1887–1889, 3 vols.